

685 and for a fourth offence, death by drowning. These at least were the allotted punishments, and, with the exception of the last, they were generally carried into effect in all cases of robbery of public property or of church goods. But in cases of private robbery the usual influences had their weight. Near relationship might sway [662] the judges to a milder sentence; or a fair bribe, judiciously bestowed, might induce the chief Láma of the monastery of Hémis to interfere, by an appeal to the king's mercy, which it was unusual to refuse. A direct appeal could also be made to the king by the prisoner's relatives, on the presentation of an offering of four or five rupees, if the criminal was a poor man, or of fifty to a hundred rupees, if he was a rich man.

684 For Adultery, where the woman was the guilty party, the paramour, as in Europe, was fined according to his means, or received an equivalent corporal punishment, while the husband had the option of taking back the woman, if he chose to do so. Or if he did not wish to keep her, he could retain her dowry. When the husband was the guilty party, the wife could demand back her dowry.

• 683 Common disputes, involving blows and abuse, were settled at once by fines and stripes.

695 In doubtful cases, where the evidence was unsatisfactory, a decision was obtained either by casting lots, or by ordeal. In the latter case, the accused had either to draw a red-hot iron through his hand, or to take a stone out of a pot of boiling oil without injury. In Great Tibet both of these ordeals are practised; but the latter is rendered much more complicated and difficult by the immersion of two stones, one black and the other white,
